Model name : Similar to the Tilton

Type : manual

Period/date : ca. 1935

Gender : Mens

Case Maker : Gruen Watch Co

Case Material : 10kt yellow gold filled

Case Serial : 2336715

Case Style no : 186

Caliber : 165

Movement Maker : Gruen Guild

Movement Serial: unknown

Bracelet : Metal or cord (what is this type of metal bracelet called?)

Other info : This is an exact match to Strap 320. A 1936 ad for the Tilton in Mike Barnett's 1930s decade book shows that this watch is very similar to the Tilton but not an exact match. The ad for this watch shows a metal bracelet but the other Tilttons show cord bracelets. The case does not include a movement number but only the case style number. (The case does close nicely but was open in that complete shot as I was taking pictures.

Very nice Kastner! I have one exactly like yours and only 63 watches ahead of yours according to the serial. I also have a similar Wadsworth cased 165 as well though a thinner looking bezel and a Guild A 165, squared up from the other 165 oddly enough.

Very nice , Jason...Love the black dial! I wonder if mine is also called a Tilton, even though it has the later caliber 355?

The difference in movement size is so slight that I'm thinking they just reused the case as is...mine is also stamped 186.

When I find my caliber 163, I'll see how the fit is.

Mine came with a braided leather strap that fell apart when removing it to clean the case. I call this type of braided band a Bolo strap.
I did purchase some braided leather to replace it but chose the too thick option and now need to go get the thinner one.

Here's mine...

Those are great Liz and Gary. It is nice seeing the variety in the Tilton family.

The downsized version seems to be a Strap 263 with filed down band attachment. It seems to have originally had 6 ring elements which were filed down to 4 and two stubs do fit a different band. And I believe that this is the "real" Tilton. I have about 20 ads from 1934 to 1939 showing a Tilton and all of them have the small size. They come with different dials (white and black). But there is not a single one showing Strap 320 as Tilton. Does anyone have a proof showing Strap 320 as "Tilton"?

I had forgotten I have a gallery with my Tilton as it was in my "Watch Shop" only.

I've added the Tilton Gallery to my Mikes Restored Gruens gallery page.

You're right Barney (I'm really not doing well with matching watches lately!), all the ads in Mike's book shows that the "real" Tilton is the small size. I suppose that Liz, Gary, and I need to call our large watches Tiltonish.

Jason...3 more Our Fathers!

I've personally never seen an ad for this so I'll believe anything you call it.

I've wondered how one would replace the leather on one of these. A bolo tie would make a perfect donor. I actually like this sort of strap and will punch anybody who calls me girly.

Out here in the west you wouldn't be called girly. My brother-in-law from New Mexico used to wear one all the time.

"In 2005...a 17-year-old high school senior in Montana was denied his diploma because he wore a bolo tie to his graduation ceremony.... The state's governor rushed to the lad's defense, declaring, "In Montana and anyplace in Indian country, a bolo tie is dressed up... a tie is a tie." In fact, in 1971, the state of Arizona had already made the bola tie (as it's spelled there) its official state neckwear. New Mexico followed suit in 2007.

Jason, here's an ID from the Model ID Guide Vol 2 page 44.

This one shows a cord strap. It wasn't until a 1938 ad that I saw a metal strap on one of these.

There is one advertised with the description "Black dial. Yellow gold hands and numerals" and another with a black dial that almost perfectly matches Jason's.

A nice illustration of a black dial model is on page 94 of The 1930's.

I noticed a phase in the 1930s where a number of men's watches are slender and small. They are easy enough to confuse with a women's watch that many of the ads explicitly point out it's a men's watch. I'm surprised Gruen decided to launch the Tilton with a cord bracelet rather than a metal one.

I saw those pictures Mike, but we still seem to have the Tilton vs Tilton-ish problem that Barney pointed out regarding the thin and thick cases.

Yes, the case difference I see is the extra bits at the lug ends of the case, and even some on the sides.

I believe the longer case watch above is a Culver. The images of the Culver show 6 of the wire loops at the end just like in the picture above. It's the closest match I've been able to find.

The Skipper is another with the same design of lugs but it has more ornate sides to the bezel.

Hi Mike,

I also first thought that the Culver has the wire loops at the end but finally came to the conclusion that the loops are not part of the case but the band.

There are two versions of the Skipper which I have seen that are Strap 264 and Strap 280. One has all four sides stepped the other one only the long sides. I have ads of both versions appraising the watches as the Skipper.

Remains Strap 320 without a name, but there is the "Baron" left. I wanted to check tonight when I am back home if the picture in your ID book match with Strap 320.

Whats still left in the Tilton family are the Quadron members. Brothers in arms are Quadron 120, 121, 124 and 125 plus Quadron 140, all are sub second versions and as such easy to distinguish from the Straps. All of them have those wire loops but slightly differing cases and movements again.

I would agree. I think the Culver and the Lakehurst are the same watch other than bracelet vs. band.

Had a short look into Mikes ID book. The "Baron" seems to be slightly curved at the sides and has a subsecond so it definitely is not Strap 320. Not quite sure if it is a Quadron, the Quadron 140 should come with caliber 485 which is a 15 jewel caliber which would fit the Baron. But it does not look curved in the Master Book. There is a number of wire loop watches with sub second around 1936 in Mikes 30s book, but they are all unnamed. These might be the various Quadrans.
